

[NB: The following is a pre-publication copy of an article scheduled to appear in vol. 51:2 of the Osgoode Hall Law Journal (winter 2014).]

Philip Girard, “A Tempest in a Transatlantic Teapot: A Legal Historian’s Critical Analysis of La Bataille de Londres”

On 8 April 2013 Les Édition du Boréal released a book by Frédéric Bastien entitled La Bataille de Londres: Dessous, secrets, et coulisses du rapatriement constitutionnel. In it, Bastien retold the patriation saga of 1978-82 using new evidence from the United Kingdom, mainly British diplomatic correspondence obtained through freedom of information requests. While the book shed new light on the politics of the patriation process, especially on the British side, it was Bastien’s allegations about the activities of two judges on the Supreme Court of Canada that immediately garnered front-page headlines in the English and French media.¹ Bastien alleged that Chief Justice Laskin and Justice W.Z. ‘Bud’ Estey had had back-channel communications with the federal and British authorities before and during the Patriation reference, improprieties that, in Bastien’s view, rendered the opinion null and void and the constitutional deal of 1981-82 illegitimate. For Dr Bastien, the actions of Pierre Trudeau coupled with those of the judges amounted to nothing less than a coup d’état that aimed to overturn the existing constitutional order.² The purpose of this article is to argue that, with one exception, Dr Bastien is mistaken in his interpretation of the judges’ conduct, and that in the one case where there is some cause for concern, any impropriety would have no effect on the validity of the Patriation Reference or the constitutional accord arrived at in the fall of 1981.

Bastien’s publisher Boréal couldn’t have timed matters better: the book’s release coincided not only with the date of Margaret Thatcher’s death but the selection of Pierre Trudeau’s son Justin as leader of the federal Liberal Party. A photo of Thatcher and Trudeau appears on the cover of La Bataille de Londres, and the Iron Lady plays a key role in the book and in Bastien’s interpretation of events. But even without the coincidence of Lady Thatcher’s death and Justin Trudeau’s win, the story clearly had legs. In the francophone media in Quebec the ‘revelations’ were treated as the Canadian equivalent of the Wikileaks scandal, with Bastien cast in the role of Julian Assange. For weeks scarcely a day went by without some print coverage in Quebec, numerous letters to the editor, and hundreds of reactions, mostly angry, on newspaper websites, not to mention radio and television shows, internet discussion and so on.

The Supreme Court of Canada immediately announced it would conduct its own investigation, and on 26 April, announced the result.³ The Court said, somewhat anti-climactically, ‘there is nothing in our files about this.’ That is probably all the Court could or should have done, but it was not likely to satisfy those who still had questions about the matter. On 16 April, barely a week after the release of the book, the provincial legislature, the

¹ E.g., Globe and Mail (8 Apr. 2013); Le Devoir (8 Apr. 2013).

² La Bataille de Londres, chap. 14 (‘Coup d’État à la Cour suprême’) and 352-53.

³ Globe and Mail, 27 Apr. 2013.

Assemblée Nationale du Québec, unanimously resolved to demand that the federal government release all papers in its custody relating to the matter.⁴ Maxime Bernier, the Minister of State for Small Business and Tourism, responded that the Harper government planned to concentrate on the economy. The federal government's response more or less tracked that in English Canada: lack of interest after the initial day or two of headlines.

The reaction in Quebec is not terribly surprising. The accord leading to the Constitution Act 1982, an accord which the Quebec government did not join, has always been seen as illegitimate and a source of grievance in some circles, whatever its legality. The decade of negotiations that followed 1982, which attempted to secure Quebec's endorsement of a new constitutional package, only made matters worse, ending with the defeat of the Charlottetown Accord and the 1995 Quebec referendum. The two decades of constitutional 'peace' that have followed have been in some sense artificial. English Canada hoped that time would heal past wounds and that demographic change would weaken the sovereigntist cause. To some extent that has occurred, as shown by the weak minority government achieved by the Parti Québécois in September 2012, after nine years out of power, and the decimation of the Bloc Québécois in the 2011 federal election. But the controversy created by Bastien's book demonstrates that the wounds opened in the constitutional battles of 1980-82 remain far from healed. It is important that his charges be examined in a careful and dispassionate fashion.

I will suggest that Dr Bastien's interpretation of the documents he obtained is by turns erroneous, exaggerated, and unsupported by the evidence. In some instances the evidence itself is highly ambiguous and/or enigmatic, making it unsafe to draw any solid inferences or conclusions. In others Dr Bastien seriously misapprehends the law or court process and draws incorrect inferences based on mistaken assumptions. In yet others, evidence is easily available that contradicts his interpretations. While I have written a biography of Bora Laskin and served as clerk to Justice Estey at the Supreme Court of Canada in 1979-80, my goal in conducting this review is not to protect either man from attack. The biography was an unauthorized one, unconnected with the Laskin family in any way.⁵ While I found much to admire in my study of Laskin, I did not portray him as a flawless hero. The reader may refer in particular to my discussion of the Berger Affair in chapter 23, where I am highly critical of Laskin, and to the conclusion where I assess his strengths and weaknesses in what I hope is a balanced fashion. Historians must always be ready to revise their views in light of new research. If I found Bastien's criticisms to be persuasive and well-founded I would not hesitate to adopt them and revise my views accordingly, however inconvenient they might be. But I do not, and have not, for reasons that will become clear.

⁴ Le Devoir, 17 Apr. 2013.

⁵ Curiously, in his bibliography, Dr. Bastien lists my book as follows: 'Girard, Philip et Bora Laskin. Bringing Law to Life, Toronto, University of Toronto Press,' as if Laskin and I were joint authors. A Freudian slip? On the sole occasion that he cites my book in the text, he does so properly.

Dr Bastien makes no secret of his political and ideological preferences. A strong Quebec nationalist, he detests the Trudeauvian legacy of the Charter, multiculturalism, and minority language rights.⁶ He believes that the Quebec state should have full power over the language of education and should not have its hands tied by appointed judges enforcing Charter rights in other areas of state policy. Enamoured of organic approaches to society, he abhors liberalism and embraces Joe Clark's 'community of communities' as the appropriate model for the Canadian polity.⁷ Bastien is entitled to his views, and his concerns about the arguably anti-democratic nature of the Charter are shared by others in Canada, on both ends of the political spectrum.⁸ But one is entitled to ask to what extent these views drive and indeed distort the interpretation of the evidence in La Bataille de Londres.

In the 'postface' to his book, Dr Bastien rails against what he sees as a negative trend in academic granting agencies, to wit, the tendency to stress theory over empiricism such that 'the writing of history consists of deducing a conclusion in advance, through the employment of a theory. This approach is even better demonstrated when the researcher, driven by this initial perspective, necessarily concentrates on documents supporting his original position, while ignoring those that do not conform to the abstract approach that the theory would dictate.'⁹

It is hard not to turn these words against Dr Bastien himself. Theory did not dictate the documents that he sought out, but his relentlessly anti-Charter perspective leads him to interpret them with a dogmatic rigidity. In the author's mind there is never any doubt, ambiguity, or nuance. Federal politicians and the impugned judges are always engaged in secret and illicit machinations, sending 'coded' messages that the author believes he can decrypt, and steadily working towards the goal of foisting the hated Charter of Rights on an innocent and unsuspecting populace. Aside from anything else, this is simply not good historical practice. Historians are supposed to assess evidence impartially, to be sensitive to multiple meanings, and to pay particular attention to context.

The number of pages taken up with the accusations of impropriety levelled at the two judges is not large considering the size of the book. But these accusations are at the very heart of Dr Bastien's project of delegitimation. Any dirty tricks by the politicians can be chalked up to, well, politics. Short of actual corruption, violence or intimidation, it is hard to say that any tactics are off the table in Canadian politics. Dr Bastien would not sway many readers with allegations that federal politicians played dirty pool during the patriation wars, because the conduct of the dissenting premiers at times was hardly above reproach either. He seems to accept, for example, that a career member of the Department of External Affairs was a secret sovereigntist and spy for

⁶ La Bataille de Londres, 118-20, 223-31 and passim.

⁷ Ibid., 260-64.

⁸ Rainer Knopff and F.L. Morton, Charter Politics (Scarborough, ON: Nelson Canada, 1992); Michael Mandel, The Charter of Rights and the Legalization of Politics in Canada, rev. ed. (Toronto: Thompson Educational Publishing, 1994).

⁹ La Bataille de Londres, 456.

Quebec who leaked many confidential documents to the press in February 1981 in an attempt to derail the federal constitutional project.¹⁰ But allegations that the chief justice of Canada conspired secretly with the British and Ottawa to stack the deck against the Gang of Eight would be different: if proven, those could be politically explosive, perhaps even beyond Quebec.

Bastien labels Bora Laskin as a ‘grand partisan de la Charte’ who would do anything, even to the point of contravening his judicial oath, to help Trudeau pass his constitutional package. He duly notes the inconvenient fact that Laskin vehemently opposed Diefenbaker’s bill of rights, but then asserts that he reversed his views about the constitutional protection of rights on joining the bench in 1965.¹¹ For this he relies on a statement by Michael Mandel that Laskin ‘brought to the Supreme Court his strong beliefs in American-style judicial activism.’¹² Mandel’s assessment accords with Bastien’s own view but it would be seen as overly broad by those, such as Denise Réaume, who have explored Laskin’s jurisprudential thought in depth. While Laskin certainly admired many things about American jurisprudence, and there are elements of ‘activism’ in his own, he was acutely aware of the distinction between the US constitution and one based on parliamentary supremacy, and the correspondingly different role required of the judiciary in both jurisdictions.¹³

As Réaume demonstrates, based on his writings pre- and post-1965, Laskin had a nuanced and layered view of the judicial role, based on whether common law, statutory or constitutional interpretation was involved. He ‘recognize[d] the need to prevent [courts] from controlling too large a share of the governance of society even when their intentions were for the best. Courts have a responsibility to supervise the development of the law, but they are not an elected body, and this limits their capacity and entitlement to speak for society.’¹⁴ And long before the recent vogue for discussing the relationship between courts and legislatures in terms of ‘dialogue theory,’ Laskin saw them as working in ‘a partnership of sorts.’¹⁵ My own analysis of Laskin’s judicial decisions largely supports Réaume’s analysis, which is based on his scholarship. Laskin cherished liberal values but he was not a classical liberal; rather, he was a modernist who believed in a strong role for the state in redressing social and economic inequality so that all, not just a few in society, could aspire to the human flourishing promised by liberalism. There is much more concern with legislative deference and social stability in Laskin’s judicial oeuvre than the broad labels ‘activist’ or ‘Charter liberal’ can account for.

La Bataille de Londres retells the patriation saga by adding the British perspective to an already well-known narrative. Through creative research and the filing of innumerable access to ¹⁰ Mark MacGuigan, An Inside Look at External Affairs during the Trudeau Years: the Memoirs of Mark MacGuigan (Calgary: University of Calgary Press, 2002), 99. The ‘mole’ was allowed to retire and no charges were laid, for fear of arousing Quebec opinion at a sensitive time; La Bataille de Londres, 249-50.

¹¹ La Bataille de Londres, 317-18.

¹² Mandel, Charter of Rights, 23.

¹³ Bora Laskin, ‘The Function of Law’ Alberta Law Review 11 (1973): 118-23

¹⁴ ‘The Judicial Philosophy of Bora Laskin’ University of Toronto Law Journal 35 (1985): 453.

¹⁵ Ibid., 452.

information requests, Dr Bastien was able to obtain copies of much of the relevant British diplomatic correspondence: in particular, messages to and from the British High Commission in Ottawa and the Foreign Office in London, and notes prepared by various officials for the use of the latter. He also consulted some External Affairs documentation at Library and Archives Canada, and some material originating in provincial ministries of inter-governmental affairs, but claims to have had much less success with freedom of information requests in Canada than in Britain.

This strategy had much to commend it, and it did turn up some new information, including the references to the judges that have caused such a furore. However, most of this evidence displays an inherent frailty that is simply ignored by the author. Much of it consists of summaries of conversations and events passed on from one diplomat or official to another. Typically, A (the British High Commissioner, say) is reporting to D (the Foreign Office) on a conversation between B (someone with links to the British High Commission) and C (one of the judges, or a third party) as told by B to A. Occasionally a phrase is put in quotation marks, suggesting that C did use those exact words, but most of the conversations are reported in indirect speech; this makes it impossible to know exactly what was said or how the context of the conversation affected the meaning the parties gave to it.

A second limitation with this kind of evidence is that one cannot take at face value the assertion by a diplomat that what he or she is reporting as ‘Highly Confidential! Top Secret!’ really is so. Diplomats are supposed to gather information that is not in the public domain as well as providing ‘value-added’ interpretation to information that is: officials in the Foreign Office are as capable of reading Canadian newspapers as the staff of the British High Commission, and at much less expense too. Thus, diplomats are disposed to portray their findings as ‘insider information’ even when they are not, or to exaggerate the importance of what they convey. Trudeau once said that ‘he learned more from The New York Times than he did from the diplomatic despatches that landed on his desk.’¹⁶

A final and insurmountable difficulty with all the evidence regarding the judges in La Bataille de Londres is that their side of the story does not appear in it. The documents give us fragments of their conversations reported indirectly in words chosen by others, but nothing about their motivation and little about the context. These are not the transcripts of the Watergate tapes. Dr. Bastien is nonetheless confident that he understands exactly what the actors had in mind at various points and weaves these bits and pieces of evidence into a narrative of high-level trickery and constitutional subversion.

With these preliminary remarks we are now ready to consider each of the five incidents that Bastien characterizes as ‘interventions’ on the part of the chief justice, as well as the one attributed to Justice Estey, and to analyze them in detail.

¹⁶ Cited in MacGuigan, Inside Look, xiv.

I: 25/26 March 1981

The inherent frailties of Bastien's evidence are on full display in the first 'intervention' by the chief justice. The author refers to a note dated 26 March 1981 from the British High Commissioner at Ottawa, John Ford, to the Foreign Office, reporting that the previous day, the 25th, he had 'learned confidentially that the Supreme Court decided today that it will hear the Manitoba appeal on April 28, much sooner than the federal government expected. The chief justice gave the impression (to a federal government source, not to be revealed please) that he hoped (or, possibly, *expected*¹⁷) to convey the court's opinion before the end of the Parliamentary process in the United Kingdom.' Bastien relates that '[t]his information was immediately communicated to the attorney general of Great Britain, Michael Havers. He confirmed what everyone suspected, that the situation "makes it very difficult, if not impossible, for the British Parliament to decide on the Canadian request before the expected judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada is made public."' ¹⁸

There seem to be two allegations here: first, that Laskin improperly tipped off the federal government about the date the Manitoba appeal would be heard. And second, that he planned to expedite the Court's process in some illegitimate way in order to aid the federal government and informed them of this plan.

Let us look first at the dates. The alleged leak occurred on 25 March, the day that the Court decided when the Manitoba appeal would be heard. The registrar's office of the Court confirmed with me that such information is not confidential. The Court can only set such a date tentatively, subject to verification with the parties. The parties' lawyers will do all they can to appear on the date the Court has set but sometimes it is not possible and a new date will have to be arranged. In this case, the Court confirmed the date of 28 April with both parties the next day. A document held by the registrar's office in what it calls the 'court file,' dated 26 March 1981, sets out the dates for the filing of documents in the appeal and concludes with the statement, 'the hearing of the appeal, counsel for the Attorney- General of Manitoba and counsel for the

¹⁷ Bastien provides only his own translations of the original English documents. As a result one is left to speculate about the original wording. Here Bastien uses the French word 'espérait'; presumably he would have used 'attendait' if 'expected' was the original English word, but one cannot be sure. All translations of passages from his book are my own.

¹⁸ Ibid., 292 (emphasis added) As for Havers's reaction to the information, it is not clear why he was only now waking up to the fact that the Supreme Court was going to rule on the patriation issue. The Manitoba Court of Appeal had rendered its decision on 3 February and premier Sterling Lyon announced his intention to appeal the decision a week later (Globe and Mail, 10 Feb. 1981). The Supreme Court Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. S-19, s. 36 stated that there was a right of appeal from the decision of a provincial court of appeal 'on any matter referred to it for hearing and consideration by the lieutenant governor in council of that province' (as had occurred here), so there was no doubt: the issue was going to the Supreme Court. As of mid-February, that was perfectly clear to anyone.

Attorney-General of Canada consenting, [will] commence at the opening of the April term of the Court, namely, on Tuesday, April 28, 1981.’ The document is signed by the Court registrar, Bernard Hofley, and there is a hand-written note, presumably by him, stating ‘Read to counsel by Chief Justice and agreed to 26/3/81.’¹⁹

The Court may have announced this publicly on the 26th, but in any case on 27 March both prime minister Trudeau and Joe Clark referred in Parliament to the Supreme Court’s decision to hear the appeal on 28 April.²⁰ The ‘confidential tip’ that Ford was passing on was never confidential information—there was no problem with Laskin mentioning the 28 April date to a ‘federal source’ or anyone else on the 25th, and the date was public knowledge within a matter of hours, probably before Havers even read the note.

Dr. Bastien has committed several basic errors here. He is not at all critical of his source, the Ford note, which he accepts at face value. He does not seek to check the veracity of the information in it, even though several obvious and easily accessible Canadian sources were available to do so: newspaper accounts, Parliamentary debates, and the records of the Court itself, which are public records available to anyone. (I was sent scanned copies of the relevant documents the day after my inquiry.) And he has not thought to inquire what the normal procedure of the Court would be when setting the dates for the hearing of appeals.

Now for the second allegation. The unidentified federal government ‘source’ heard the chief justice say something from which he or she derived an ‘impression’ about the date when Laskin ‘hoped’ the Court’s opinion would be ready. Expressing a ‘hope’ or even an ‘expectation’ is not equivalent to passing on confidential information, and any interested observer would know that the chief justice was not capable of forcing his eight colleagues to reach a decision within a set time frame. Given the vagueness and ambiguity of the terms used, it is simply impossible to reconstruct the interchange between Laskin and the ‘source’ on the basis of Ford’s note. Does this give the author pause? Not a bit. According to Bastien, ‘Laskin ... was obviously in direct contact with the executive power: he spoke to someone highly placed in the federal government, who passed on the message to the British government. Clearly, knowing the difficulties of the English government given that the matter was sub judice, he sought to accelerate the judicial process.’²¹

The note says nothing about whether the ‘source’ was ‘highly placed’—this is pure speculation on Bastien’s part—nor can one equate the vague expression ‘gave the impression’ with anything like ‘direct contact.’ If anything, ‘gave the impression’ suggests a studied evasiveness on Laskin’s part that the ‘source’ is trying to paper over.

¹⁹ Email dated 8 May 2013 from Records Centre, Registrar’s Office, Supreme Court of Canada to the author, with attached files (available from the author). The Court maintains on site only a limited file relating to older cases; the full court file on patriation is at Library and Archives Canada.

²⁰ Globe and Mail, 28 Mar. 1981.

²¹ Ibid., 293.

Nonetheless, some twenty pages later, without any more evidence being introduced on this incident, the reader is treated to an even more fevered interpretation of this non-event. After rehearsing briefly Laskin's career, Bastien advises that Trudeau was counting on Laskin 'to help his cause triumph in the spring of 1981.' The British allegedly realized this as well because as we have seen, they were informed thanks to Laskin that the Supreme Court would take charge ('se saisirait') of the patriation case and expedite it promptly. This information having come via federal sources it seems impossible that Trudeau was not aware of it. And as Laskin was a centralizer plus a great supporter of the Charter of rights, it is obvious that the rapidity with which he intended to guide the process was aimed at furthering Ottawa's cause in London. The message that he sent to the English was aimed at encouraging them: the Court will expedite the matter. At the same time, the chief justice informed the federal authorities that they need not worry about the matter getting mired before the top court. Laskin took it upon himself to inform them of what was going on; they knew that they could count on the help of this most influential judge. In a way, Laskin's message amounted to saying: have confidence in me, the Supreme Court is going to deliver the goods.²²

All of this may be 'obvious' to Dr. Bastien, but it will not be to the reader who has been paying attention to the evidence provided earlier or has any familiarity with the Court's process on reference cases. Whoever the 'federal source' was who heard Laskin mention the non-confidential date of the hearing and express a hope about the timing of the decision, Bastien has provided no evidence at all that Laskin realized this person was or might be in contact with the British High Commission. But all of a sudden he has Laskin 'sending' messages to the English. There is a crucial missing link here.

Other evidence not cited by Bastien also demonstrates that he has completely misinterpreted what he has found. With his assumption that everything important happens behind closed doors, he has not checked the newspapers to see what was public information at the time. Globe and Mail reporter Robert Sheppard wrote on 1 April that Government sources confirmed yesterday that Chief Justice Laskin raised the problem of timing with federal lawyers last week in a preliminary meeting in chambers to discuss the appeal of the Manitoba Court of Appeal decision, which was in favour of Ottawa. The Chief Justice was concerned about the relevance of a Supreme Court ruling if the matter had already been decided in Westminster.²³

²² Ibid., 318-19.

²³ Globe and Mail, 1 Apr. 1981 (emphasis added).

Reporter Claude Turcotte of Le Devoir expanded on a Canadian Press story on the same date that some of the judges were concerned that the dignity of the Court was being trampled on by the government's mode of proceeding.²⁴

Even better evidence has now come to light: Barry Strayer, one of the participants in the 26 March 1981 meeting with the chief justice has now published his version of that encounter.²⁵ One cannot fault Dr. Bastien for not advertent to this source as it was only published in early 2013, when his book was in press. In 1981 Dr. Strayer was assistant deputy minister for public law in the federal department of Justice and thus head of the branch responsible for providing constitutional advice to the government. Along with John Scollin, senior counsel from the department, he reports attending a meeting with Bora Laskin in the judge's chambers at the 'end of March,' before the Newfoundland Supreme Court decision (ruling Trudeau's measure illegal) had come down on 31 March. He does not state the exact date, but it must have been 26 March as noted in the Supreme Court document referred to earlier, a date which is also consistent with the newspaper reports of 1 April. At the meeting, in Strayer's account, Kerr Twaddle, counsel for Manitoba, 'press[ed] the Supreme Court to fix an early date for a hearing, for fear that the joint resolution would be passed by Parliament and sent to London before the Supreme Court could pronounce on the matter.' Laskin then looked at the federal government counsel and said 'Surely the government does not plan to proceed with adoption of the resolution before our hearing.' It fell to Strayer to state frankly that that was exactly what was planned. This 'seemed to shock the Chief'; he 'grimaced and said that he would fix an early date for the hearing to commence a little over a month later.' Strayer protested that this would be too soon to hear the appeals from the other provinces, but to no avail. While conceding that all three appeals were heard together in the end, he avers that 'the timetable was without precedent.'²⁶

On 26 March Laskin, contrary to Bastien's interpretation, was trying to slow down the federal government by warning it, in effect, to wait for its decision before taking the next step. The concern about waiting for the Court's decision became academic on 31 March, however, when the Newfoundland Supreme Court released its opinion that Trudeau's unilateral request was illegal. The cabinet decided within minutes to appeal and to wait for the Supreme Court's opinion before going to London.²⁷ That is probably why the government was now content to confirm on 1 April what had gone on the week before—because it was now allaying the Court's concerns by saying it would wait for its decision, and showing the Canadian public that it was not behaving in a precipitous fashion.

By scheduling the Manitoba appeal for 28 April, the Court was sending a message to the public that it was treating the patriation matter seriously and expeditiously, as the provincial

²⁴ Le Devoir, 1 Apr. 1981. I thank Professor Louis Massicotte of Université Laval for bringing these sources to my attention.

²⁵ Barry Strayer, Canada's Constitutional Revolution (Edmonton: University of Alberta Press, 2013), 173.

²⁶ Ibid.

²⁷ source

courts of appeal had done and as the Supreme Court had done in other reference cases. There is no need to resort to conspiracy theory or secret messages, nor does Ford's note provide any basis for an assertion that the separation of powers was breached in this instance. The Court was treating this reference in the same way it had dealt with other politically sensitive reference cases in recent memory. The Anti-Inflation Reference of 1976 was heard within seven weeks of the reference being lodged with the Court (11 March to 31 May), which in turn rendered its opinion a mere five weeks after the close of argument, in spite of this being arguably the most important case heard by the Court since the abolition of Privy Council appeals.²⁸ The Senate Reference in 1980 took nine months from hearing to judgment, but there was no particular urgency about the Court's opinion in that instance.²⁹ And observers expected, based on the Anti-Inflation Act experience, that the Supreme Court would take about two months to render its decision.³⁰

To conclude on this point: the alleged 'intervention' by Laskin erected on the basis of the Ford note is a pure 'invention,' based on incomplete research, lack of understanding of the Supreme Court's process, and an uncritical approach to the note itself.

Before proceeding to consider the other 'interventions' by Laskin, it is necessary to consider the sole 'intervention' attributed to Justice W.Z. Estey. The case against him rests on an opinion expressed to John Ford in October 1980, shortly after Trudeau revealed his plan for unilateral patriation, and a comment made to Ford about a talk Estey had had with premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan around the same time. Ford's note states that Estey said the legality of Trudeau's move would be put into question, and that the Supreme Court would take two months to decide the case. Here is Bastien's interpretation of this evidence:

It is to say the least striking to see a judge of the Supreme Court engage freely in a political conversation with a representative of the executive power—in constitutional matters, London was still the imperial government, and as a result John Ford was part of the executive branch of government. Now, Estey indicated to him that it was likely that the Court would be seized of the matter, thus warning Her Majesty's government."³¹

One hardly knows where to begin in deconstructing this extraordinary statement. Let's start with the constitutional law. If one lives, say, in the British Virgin Islands, or on St. Helena, perhaps there is still an entity called the 'imperial government' with which one must deal. The fact that the British Parliament was the 'legislative trustee' of the Canadian constitution until 1982 did not mean that Canada was subordinate to or involved in any way in a relationship with an 'imperial government.' The Canada-Britain relationship ceased to be an imperial one after the passage of the Statute of Westminster 1931, but at the very latest since 1947.³² Since then Canada has dealt

²⁸ [1976] 2 S.C.R. 373.

²⁹ Reference re Authority of Parliament in relation to the Upper House, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 54.

³⁰ Globe and Mail, 5 May 1981.

³¹ La Bataille de Londres, 320.

³² Cit Hogg etc on this with Britain as a foreign power, and vice versa, as Bastien's own evidence shows earlier in the book: he quotes Merv Johnson, Saskatchewan's agent-general in London, as saying 'the British government [will] treat this question [of patriation] as if it were a matter of international relations, not imperial relations.'³³ Throughout the patriation affair, Canada dealt with the British government, not an imperial government. Bastien's reasoning that Estey breached the separation of powers by communicating with Ford is based on anachronistic ideas and, indeed, on an utter constitutional fantasy.

But even if this point is conceded for the sake of argument—that Estey was communicating with a representative of the 'imperial' government—there was nothing improper about the content of the exchange between the two men. In October 1980, there was absolutely nothing wrong with Estey expressing to the British High Commissioner or anyone else the opinion that Trudeau's unilateral patriation resolution would likely be put into question. It was not a 'warning' or 'tip' and did not involve 'inside information' of any kind. Anyone who had taken Federalism 101 would know that such a challenge was not only likely but almost inevitable, and indeed the provinces launched their first court action already on 23 October.

As Bastien himself shows, the first thing Margaret Thatcher, herself a barrister, asked when External Affairs Minister Mark MacGuigan met with her on 5 October 1980—before Estey's meeting with Ford—was whether Trudeau's unilateralist resolution would be challenged in the courts.³⁴ She did not need to be 'tipped off' that such an eventuality existed. And as for the judge's estimate of the time the Court would take, we have been through this earlier: there is nothing confidential about a Supreme Court judge expressing an opinion about the time it might take for a decision to be rendered. Caveat emptor though – the Court took over twice as long as Estey had estimated.

Ford's note passes on Estey's concern about the Western alienation he encountered on a recent trip to Saskatchewan—a concern shared by virtually all eastern Canadians at the time and on full display during the patriation battles. Estey always followed matters in the West closely, and there was no reason he should not have shared his impressions with Ford, especially when they contained no more than one could read in the newspapers. Again we see Ford gamely trying to pad his despatches and Dr. Bastien taking it all at face value. Ford, by the way, was so opposed to the Charter and to Trudeau's plans, and so publicly vocal about it, that the British were obliged to recall him early in response to Canadian outrage at his undiplomatic antics.³⁵

As for Estey's meeting with Blakeney, a little context is necessary. Willard Estey was born and raised in Saskatoon, had two brothers who remained there, and visited often. His father had been attorney general of Saskatchewan and the family was well known there. Estey was acquainted with Allan Blakeney, though he certainly did not share his socialist politics, and it would not be unusual for the two men to meet when Estey passed through Saskatoon.³⁶ All Ford says about this meeting as reported by Estey is that Blakeney ‘wanted to play a positive role in the crisis but was afraid of losing the support of his electorate.’ There is no evidence that in their conversation Estey strayed into any impermissible terrain, no evidence of the slightest impropriety. There was as yet no proceeding involving any provincial premiers before the Court. Yet in responding to a comment that I wrote to this effect in Le Devoir, Bastien continues to assert that Estey’s ‘indiscrétion’ was ‘capitale.’³⁷ It is ‘capitale’ for the tale Bastien wants to tell, but that does not make his interpretation accurate. Moreover, the caption under Estey’s photo in La Bataille de Londres reads ‘Willard Estey: Supreme Court judge, he informed the British of the intentions of the top court.’ What intentions? Bastien seems honestly to believe this, but the fact is that this caption is demonstrably false based on the evidence provided in the book. He nonetheless refers on at least three more occasions to Estey’s role in ‘warning’ the British government.³⁸

³³ Ibid., 95.

³⁴ Ibid., 160.

³⁵ MacGuigan, Inside Look, 98-99. Bastien provides more details about the controversy aroused by Ford but does not seem to take a position on the appropriateness of his actions: La Bataille de Londres, 264-68.

Part of the problem here is Dr. Bastien’s unrealistic idea about what constitutes inappropriate behaviour on the part of judges. Judges are not obliged to cross the street if they see a cabinet minister coming toward them. Judges meet politicians and diplomats all the time on social occasions and at official events. They are not forbidden from discussing current events in a general way, or from observing that a contemporary dispute is likely to end up in court, as long as they do not express a view about how they think the dispute would or should be decided.

Before moving on it is also necessary to point out a possible misunderstanding on the part of Dr Bastien about the role of the Supreme Court. We have seen his statement that the Court ‘se saisirait de la question du rapatriement.’³⁹ Literally translated, this means that the Court would ‘seize itself’ of the case, or take charge of it on its own motion. Obviously, the Court has no power to deal with any matter that is not brought before it through the proper procedure. In this case either the federal government could have referred the matter directly to the Supreme Court, which it chose not to do, or a provincial government, having referred the matter to the court of appeal of that province, could appeal an unfavourable decision as of right to the Supreme Court pursuant to the provision of the Supreme Court Act noted earlier. There was no other way for this matter to come before the Court, and the Court had no power to decline to hear the case if it came forward in either of these ways. While on other occasions Dr Bastien uses the correct, passive, terminology, ‘être saisie,’⁴⁰ such haziness about a fundamental aspect of court process does not inspire confidence.

³⁶ In his memoirs, An Honourable Calling: Political Memoirs (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2008) at 152, Blakeney recalls a ‘convivial evening’ spent with ‘Bud Estey’ in Japan in the mid-1970s.

³⁷ Le Devoir, 17 April 2013 responding to my piece on the 15th.

³⁸ La Bataille de Londres, 351, 352, 446.

³⁹ La Bataille de Londres, 318.

⁴⁰ Ibid., 320.

II: June 26 1981

After spending their first and only sabbatical in London in 1961-62, the Laskins fell in love with England and returned often for their summer holidays in the 1960s and 70s. Laskin had been invited to attend the lectures of the Canadian Institute for Advanced Legal Studies, to be held in Cambridge, England and Louvain-la-Neuve, Belgium between 26 July and 8 August 1981, and as honorary patron of the institute, felt some obligation to go.⁴¹ The Laskins decided to build a long holiday around this event and sailed to Britain on the Queen Elizabeth II in June. Peggy was very concerned about her husband's health and was keen for him to take a long break from his duties at the Court. Laskin had had heart by-pass surgery followed by significant post-operative complications in the spring of 1978, was diagnosed a year later with Addison's disease, a condition which weakens the immune system, and then had emergency bowel surgery in the fall of 1979 in Vancouver and almost died. He was away from the Court until the end of January 1980 but slowly regained his strength over the next year.

This context is necessary to rebut Bastien's innuendo that Laskin's presence in London in June-July 1981 was no coincidence. He begins his account of the next 'intervention' with the statement 'Le hasard faisant bien des choses' (freely translated, 'as luck would have it'), Laskin found himself in London at the very moment when Pierre Trudeau was visiting Margaret Thatcher. The implication is clearly ironic: that there was no 'hasard' at all about Laskin's presence in London at this time. On the day of the Trudeau-Thatcher meeting, 26 June, Bastien reports that 'Laskin made a telephone call, apparently fortuitously, (comme par hasard) to Michael Pitfield, the clerk of the [Canadian] Privy Council, who was also in London.' Pitfield later met his British counterpart, the cabinet secretary Robert Armstrong, who reported the conversation thus in a note to the Foreign Office of the same date: 'Mr. Pitfield said he received a call from the chief justice of the Supreme Court advising him that he was cutting short his vacation in this country to return to Canada in early July to rejoin his colleagues on the Supreme Court for two or three days. The chief justice said to Mr. Pitfield: "you understand what that means," and hung up.'

According to Bastien, 'Pitfield seemed to decode perfectly this admittedly short and enigmatic message. He explained to Armstrong that it meant that the judgment of the Supreme Court would fall on the 7th of July. [Proclaiming the constitution on] July 1 was thus out of the question, which did not prevent Pitfield from insisting that the adoption of the constitutional resolution should occur during the summer session, which finished at the end of July, rather than waiting for the fall.'⁴²

⁴¹ See p. 508, below.

⁴² La Bataille de Londres, 321. I am given to understand that Mr. Pitfield is in poor health and not able to be interviewed about these matters.

It is not clear what precipitated Laskin's call to Pitfield. But even without knowing Laskin's travel plans, any informed observer would have realized as of June 26 (a Friday), especially with Laskin still in London, that it would be impossible for the decision to be released in time for the matter to get through the British Parliament and have the new constitution proclaimed for July 1st. And as for 'decoding the message perfectly' – Pitfield obviously did not. The judgment was nowhere near ready on 7 July.

Pitfield passed on the information about Laskin's return to Ottawa to Trudeau, who then expressed disappointment to Thatcher that the Court had been as yet unable to arrive at a decision. Bastien's interpretation of this incident is as follows: 'according to Trudeau, Laskin was returning to Ottawa to bring the matter to a close more swiftly. The clerk of the Privy Council knew this, as did his boss. Why? Because, according to all indications ('selon toute vraisemblance'), the chief justice kept them up to date regarding the deliberations of the Court, if only with bits of information and hints. ... Instead of taking the time necessary to render the best decision possible, Laskin was behaving like a politician. His objective was no longer to rule on the law but to position his court favourably, to ensure its prestige and authority in a process which amounted to the judicialization of politics.'⁴³

Once again, there is simply no evidence for these assertions. There are no 'indications' that Laskin kept the government up to date regarding the deliberations of the Court. At most the Pitfield call conveyed that the Court was still deliberating—which anyone would assume given that the judgment had not yet been released. It is strange to see Bastien putting such faith in Trudeau's speculation that Laskin was returning to Ottawa 'to bring the matter to a close more swiftly.' Laskin was returning to Ottawa because the Court was still deliberating, period. Naturally the decision would be produced more swiftly if the judges met to discuss it than if they did not. What is illegitimate about that? As chief justice, Laskin had a legitimate concern in ensuring that judgments contained not only the best legal reasoning possible, but were also produced in a timely fashion, in this case as in all others. He often berated Justice Beetz, in front of his colleagues no less, for taking excessive time to perfect his reasons. Aware that the Canadian government and public and the British government were anxiously awaiting the Court's decision, Laskin was concerned to bring the matter to a close as expeditiously as possible. But, especially given the length of the resulting opinion, there is not the slightest indication that it was 'rushed through' or that the judges sacrificed quality in order to conform to some outside schedule. There was no 'Laskin Express.'

Quite the contrary: Justice Dickson's biographers quote him as saying that the decision required "“very many more” meetings and conferences than any other case on which he had sat, “not only conferences with all the members of the Court, but also with groupings within the Court in order to try and decide the best manner of resolving the issue.”⁴⁴ This is direct evidence by a participant that the judges discussed the issues at length and were prepared to take whatever time was necessary to prepare their historic opinion. But Bastien prefers hearsay-based speculation to evidence, and does not refer to the Dickson biography anywhere in his book.

⁴³ Ibid., 322-3.

What is really interesting about this telephone call is what was not said. If Laskin had wanted to convey any message about the substance of the deliberations, now was the perfect chance, while he had Pitfield on the phone. But all he conveyed was an odd message that contained some information effectively in the public domain (the Court would not render a decision in time for a July 1st patriation date) and a further cryptic reference that was not understood by the recipient.

III: 2 July 1981

On 2 July 1981 Lord Carrington sent a telegram to Lord Moran (John Ford’s successor) at the High Commission in Ottawa reporting that Laskin had spoken that day to Sir Michael Havers, the Attorney General. Bastien observes in passing that the Canadian High Commissioner to the U.K., Jean Wadds, had informed Ottawa some weeks earlier that Havers was the designated person to reply to any questions about patriation in the British House of Commons; he asserts that this was confidential information, and suggests that Laskin was informed (by inference, improperly) of this fact.⁴⁵ Laskin did not need to be informed of something that any lawyer would have taken for granted. The attorney general would be the cabinet member expected to respond to any legal questions relating to patriation, just as Minister of Justice Jean Chrétien had carriage of the file for the Canadian government and provincial ministries of justice or attorneys general did for their respective provinces.

This telegram, which is reproduced only in part in the book in French translation but was released in full to the media, continues as follows, and I quote verbatim in the original English:

Some of the conversation was in the hearing of [Henry] Richardson, Counsellor at the Canadian High Commission. The latter has indicated to North America Department that he will be treating the conversation in strict confidence. He fully took the point which we put to him that it might be most embarrassing for the Chief Justice if the Canadian Government heard that he had been speaking in this manner in the UK. He clearly spoke more frankly to Sir Michael Havers than to others, in confidence and as between lawyers. Please therefore protect fully.

The Chief Justice said there was a major disagreement among the members of the Supreme Court. He was returning shortly to Ottawa but clearly did not expect this would bring about the immediate resolution of their difficulties. If no quick solution was found, he did not expect judgement to appear until the end of August. We needed to bear in mind that the judgement needed to be carefully polished and produced in both languages.

⁴⁴ Robert J. Sharpe and Kent Roach, Brian Dickson: A Judge’s Journey (Toronto: University of Toronto Press for the Osgoode Society, 2003), 269.

⁴⁵ La Bataille de Londres, 325.

...

In view of the confidentiality of the Chief Justice's conversation with the Attorney General, it would clearly be wrong for you [i.e., Lord Moran] to reveal at this stage that we now have a clear indication of further likely delay by the Supreme Court. You will therefore want to respond to Pitfield's queries which were put on the basis of a possible judgement in early July. On his question whether there was any hope of early action here in the event of a clear line from the Supreme Court, I see no need for you to go beyond the language you have already used, quoting the Prime Minister and Lord Privy Seal. ...

This is clearly a surprising document to come across. One would not expect Laskin to be talking to the English attorney general while the judges were still deliberating on the case. But was it a serious breach of judicial ethics? Laskin knew that the British Parliament would rise for its summer break after the wedding of Charles and Diana on 29 July; he was essentially advising Havers that the government would not have to deal with the issue that month—that it would not arise until the fall. The British government was not, it will be recalled, a party to the reference. Laskin probably thought he could rely on the discretion of the English Attorney General not to share this information with the actual parties, and that is the line taken by Lord Carrington. In fact he tells Lord Moran not to share this information with Michael Pitfield. The telegram does not say what part of the conversation was in the hearing of Mr. Richardson but does say that he agreed to treat the matter in strict confidence.

Upon receipt of the telegram, Lord Moran replied that in his opinion, 'unless certain factors in this regard escape us, it seems extremely improbable that Richardson would not have presented a complete account.'⁴⁶ The basis for this opinion is not clear, and it is only an opinion. Richardson himself was a counsellor with the Canadian High Commission who had been seconded to the British Foreign Office, so Dr Bastien tells us.⁴⁷ Why he should have been present for part of this meeting is unclear. That Richardson had not gone back on his word is suggested by Bastien's own evidence regarding an exchange between Michael Pitfield and British cabinet secretary Richard Armstrong in Ottawa on 9 July, to be discussed shortly. Based on this exchange, a week after Laskin's meeting with Havers, Pitfield appears to have acquired no new information about the timing of the judgment since the cryptic call from Laskin on 26 June. If Richardson had spoken to anyone at the Canadian High Commission or in the Canadian government about this, the information, we can safely assume, would have gone straight to Pitfield. But Armstrong reported on 9 July that Pitfield 'seemed resigned to the idea that the ⁴⁷ According to Bastien, Richardson had been seconded from the Canadian High Commission to the British Foreign Office, North America Department as of November 1980: La Bataille de Londres, 216-17. Presumably he was still functioning in that capacity, as otherwise Lord Carrington would have no authority to ask him to observe confidentiality, but this is not entirely clear.

⁴⁶ Ibid., 326

Court would not render its decision this week.’ It is also interesting that Laskin was prepared to say more to Havers on the 2nd than to Pitfield the week before. To Havers he stated that the opinion would not be ready until the end of the summer. To Pitfield Laskin said nothing intelligible about the timing, suggesting that he made a clear distinction in his mind between what it was appropriate to say to a non-party such as the British government, and what might be said to the agent of a party to the case such as Pitfield.

It was imprudent of Laskin to speak to Havers. But he revealed nothing, apparently, about the substance of the disagreement among the judges. There is no evidence at all that Laskin was ‘caving in’ to the federal position, or that he was inappropriately trying to sway his fellow judges to one position or another.

IV: 15 July 1981

It appears that Laskin flew to Ottawa shortly after meeting with Havers and then returned to London some time before he was due to attend a dinner on 15 July at the Middle Temple, the site of the next ‘intervention.’ After the meal he met Ian Sinclair, one of the jurists at the Foreign Office who was working on the patriation file. Sinclair reported their conversation the next day to Martin Berthoud, head of the North America desk at the Foreign Office, in the following terms: ‘He said he had recently returned to Ottawa “to try to knock a few heads together”. He had not however had much success in this regard. This clearly indicated that the Supreme Court remained seriously divided.’⁴⁸ Bastien labels this a ‘confidence’ but without more context it is impossible to understand the content and meaning of this interchange. Did Laskin take Sinclair aside to make these remarks privately after the dinner? Who initiated the conversation and how? The expression ‘knock a few heads together’ is often used in a jocular sense in English, and it is hard to imagine Laskin using it of his colleagues in other than a jocular sense, as otherwise it would sound disrespectful of them. If used in a jocular sense, it sounds more like an attempt by Laskin to evade answering a question, rather than an attempt to convey information. As in, ‘I understand you were in Ottawa recently? Oh yes, I was trying to knock a few heads together.’

Furthermore, the statement about ‘not having much success’ is reported in indirect speech. Is it something Laskin actually said or an inference Sinclair drew from something else Laskin said? Are we in the realm of ‘giving impressions’ again? And if Laskin had already told the English attorney general two weeks earlier that the Court was divided, as he seems to have, why would he have troubled to tell a lower official in the Foreign Office the same thing, especially in the semi-public setting of a dinner at the Middle Temple? It really makes no sense. An interpretation equally if not more plausible than Bastien’s is that Sinclair himself, knowing the keen interest of his employer in the date of the Court decision, over-interpreted some harmless remarks of Laskin and rushed to report them.

⁴⁸ Ibid., 326-27.

But Bastien is not done with the ‘knocking heads’ yet. On 9 July, when Laskin was still in Ottawa, British cabinet secretary Robert Armstrong was also there and met with Michael Pitfield. Armstrong reported a conversation with Michael Pitfield to the Foreign Office as follows: ‘Pitfield said that the Supreme Court was meeting again and he supposed that the chief justice would “bang their heads together.” But he seemed resigned to the idea that the Court would not render its decision this week.’ The astute reader will have guessed where Bastien will go with this coincidence of language: ‘How not to think that [Laskin] had again spoken to Pitfield?’⁴⁹ One is tempted to invoke Freud’s observation, that sometimes a cigar is just a cigar. But innuendo and speculation cannot make up for evidence and rational argument.

V: 10 September 1981

On this day John Ford’s successor as British High Commissioner, Lord Moran, met with Bora Laskin under circumstances which are unclear. Lord Moran reported to the Foreign Office that Laskin said ‘unlike the prime minister, he could not constrain his colleagues, who were exhibiting great independence of thought.’ In the High Commissioner’s view, this was ‘an indirect way of saying that the Court was divided.’⁵⁰ For once Bastien gives us no interpretation of this exchange, apparently believing that it speaks for itself. It does: it is a completely anodyne exchange that reveals nothing of substance and, coming just two weeks before the release of the decision itself, could not possibly have affected the actions of any of the parties had they known of it.

Of all the ‘interventions’ described in La Bataille de Londres, only one comes close to involving any kind of a breach of judicial ethics, and that is Laskin’s meeting with the English attorney general on 2 July 1981. The others are either completely without substance, as with the first and fifth incidents and the one involving Justice Estey, or the evidence adduced is too unsatisfactory to support an inference of impropriety, as with the second and fourth incidents. With regard to the meeting with Havers, the context relates to the timing of the presentation of the resolution to the British parliament. The essence of Laskin’s message was ‘we are divided and it is very unlikely that we will release our opinion in time for the prime minister to present his resolution to you before the end of July.’ Laskin did not discuss the substance of the decision as far as we know and only spoke to its timing. It could be argued that Laskin did nothing wrong in seeking to allay the concerns of the British government. The communication did not involve imparting information about timing to one of the parties to the reference.

⁴⁹ Ibid., 327

⁵⁰ Ibid.

However, should Laskin have foreseen that the British government might share this information with the federal government? The memo suggests that concerns about creating a firewall with the Canadian government were raised by the British, not by Laskin. But the memo does not purport to be a complete account of what transpired, so we do not know what Laskin might have said in this regard. We do not know why the Canadian counsellor Richardson was there, or what he heard during the part of the meeting he was present, or, if he heard anything confidential, whether he breached his undertaking by passing it on to the federal government.

The test for determining whether the appearance of judicial independence has been breached is ‘whether a well-informed and reasonable observer would perceive that judicial independence has been compromised.’⁵¹ If Laskin passed on information about the timing of the decision to the British, knowing or reasonably expecting that they would pass it on to the federal government and not the provincial governments, that would likely be an ‘affront to judicial independence,’ in the words of the Supreme Court, and a breach of judicial ethics.⁵² It would suggest a troubling lack of impartiality on the part of the chief justice. But the telegram does not allow us to peer into Laskin’s mind, nor is there any evidence that, even if confidentiality was not in fact respected by Havers or Richardson, Laskin was or should have been aware of that likelihood.

Even if Laskin did not expect the information about the timing of the decision to be passed on to the Canadians, his meeting with Havers is still somewhat troubling. The British and Canadian governments were working quite closely on this file, as Laskin must have known, even if each was still trying to achieve its own distinct goals. If information about his meeting with Havers had become public, and someone had complained to the Canadian Judicial Council, it is possible that Laskin could have been reprimanded for appearing to compromise the appearance of judicial independence. Given that the test relates to appearances and not results, it would not have been a defence for Laskin to argue that he was in dissent on the crucial point as to whether, by convention, Trudeau had to obtain the consent of some, or any, provincial governments.

Putting the case at its highest, that this one incident did reveal a lack of impartiality on the part of the chief justice, it still would not affect the result in any way in legal terms. As Adam Dodek has said recently,

As a matter of constitutional law, the allegations [in La Bataille de Londres] have no legal relevance because the Patriation Reference, like all references, was an advisory opinion that does not bind the government, or any party. Calling into question [the ⁵¹ Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v Tobiass, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391 at para. 70. While this case dates from the mid-1990s there is no suggestion that the test was any different in the early 1980s.

⁵² Ibid. at para. 85.

opinion's] legitimacy does not affect the legality of patriation itself [or] the enactment of the Constitution Act, 1982 and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. ... At the end of the day, the Constitution was patriated at the request of Canadians' democratically-elected representatives in Ottawa, with the substantial consent of the provincial governments. Nothing that is alleged changes that.⁵³

But Dr Bastien is, in the end, not concerned with constitutional law as such, and cites no legal treatises or law in support of his conclusion that the opinion in the Patriation Reference is null and void. His main goal is to impugn the reputation of the Supreme Court of Canada so as to undermine its legitimacy in the province of Quebec. I hope I have succeeded in showing that his allegations are not supportable and should not provide any cause for concern about the impartiality of Bora Laskin, Willard Estey, or the Court. The one allegation that does raise some doubt cannot be conclusively proved or disproved unless more evidence comes to light, and in any case has no impact on the status of the Patriation Reference itself in law.⁵⁴

⁵³ Lawyers Weekly, 26 Apr. 2013.

⁵⁴ Sir Michael Havers died in 1992 and efforts to locate Henry Richardson have been unsuccessful so far.